

Curious George rides a bike

by

H.A. REY

George loves his new bicycle and all the fun things he can do with it. But when he sets off on his new bike to deliver newspapers, some wild and wonderful adventures are in store! From exploring the river, to building a whole fleet of paper boats, to breaking his bike, to performing with the circus, George gets in and out of trouble again and again.

Copyright © 1952 by H.A. Rey
Copyright © renewed 1980 by Margret E. Rey
Copyright assigned to Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company in 1993

All rights reserved. For information about permission to reproduce selections from this book, write to trade.permissions@hmhco.com
or to Permissions, Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company, 3 Park Avenue, 19th Floor, New York, New York 10016.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOG CARD NUMBER: 52-8728

ISBN: 978-0-395-16964-3 hardcover

ISBN: 978-0-395-17444-9 paperback

Printed in China

SCP 80 79 78 77

4500636746

This is George.

He lived with his friend, the man with the yellow hat.
He was a good little monkey and always very curious.

This morning George was curious the moment he woke up because he knew it was a special day . . .

At breakfast George's friend said: "Today we are going to celebrate because just three years ago this day I brought you home with me from the jungle. So tonight I'll take you to the animal show. But first I have a surprise for you."

He took George out to the yard where a big box was standing. George was very curious.

Out of the box came a bicycle. George was delighted; that's what he had always wanted. He knew how to ride a bicycle but he had never had one of his own.

“I must go now,” said the man, “but I’ll be back in time for the show. Be careful with your new bike and keep close to the house while I am gone!”

George could ride very well. He could even do all sorts of tricks (monkeys are good at that).

For instance he could ride this way, with both hands off the handle bar,

and he could ride this way,
like a cowboy on a wild bronco,

and he could also ride backwards.
But after a while George got tired of doing tricks and went out into the street. The newsboy was just passing by with his bag full of papers. “It’s a fine bike you have there,” he said to George. “How would you like to help me deliver the papers?”

He handed George the bag and told him to do one side of the street first and then turn back and do the other side.

George was very proud as he rode off with his bag.

He started to deliver the papers
on one side of the street
as he had been told.

When he came to the last house
he saw a little river in the distance.

George was curious: he wanted to know what the river was like, so instead of turning back to deliver the rest of the papers he just went on.

There was a lot to see at the river:
a man was fishing from the bridge,
a duck family was paddling downstream,
and two boys were playing with their boats.

George would have liked to stop and look at the boats, but he was afraid the boys might find out that he had not delivered all the papers. So he rode on.

While riding along George kept thinking of boats all the time. It would be such fun to have a boat — but how could he get one? He thought and thought — and then he had an idea.

He got off the bicycle, took a newspaper out of the bag and began to fold it.

First he folded down the corners, like this,

then he folded
both edges up,

brought the ends together

and flattened
it sideways.

Then he turned
one corner up,

then the other one,

again brought
the ends together

and flattened
it sideways.

Then, gently, he pulled the ends open —

and there was his BOAT!

Now the moment had come to launch the boat. Would it float? It did!

So George decided to make some more boats. Finally he had used up all the papers and had made so many boats that he could not count them — a whole fleet.

Watching his fleet
sailing down the river
George felt like an admiral.
But watching his fleet he forgot to watch where he was going — suddenly there was a terrible jolt: the bicycle had hit a rock and George flew off the seat, head first.

Luckily George was not hurt, but the front wheel of the bicycle was all out of shape and the tire was blown out.

George tried to ride the bicycle, but of course it wouldn't go.

So he started carrying it, but it soon got too heavy.

George did not know WHAT to do: his new bike was spoiled, the newspapers were gone. He wished he had listened to his friend and kept close to the house. Now he just stood there and cried . . .

Suddenly his face brightened. Why — he had forgotten that he could ride on one wheel! He tried it and it worked. He had hardly started out again when he saw something he had never seen before: rolling toward him came an enormous tractor with huge trailers behind it. Looking out of the trailers were all sorts of animals. To George it looked like a Zoo on wheels. The tractor stopped and two men jumped out. "Well, well," said one of the men, "a little monkey who can ride a bike bronco fashion! We can use you in our animal show tonight.

I am the director of the show
and this is Bob.

He can straighten your wheel
and fix that flat in no time
and then we'll take you along to the place
where the show
is going to be."

So the three of them got into the cab and drove off. “Maybe you could play a fanfare while you ride your bike in the show,” the director said. “I have a bugle for you right here, and later on you’ll get a green coat and a cap just like Bob’s.”

On the show grounds everybody was busy getting things ready for the show. “I must do some work now,” said the director. “Meanwhile you may have a look around and get acquainted with all the animals — but you must not feed them, especially the ostrich because he will eat anything and might get very sick afterwards.”

George was curious: would the ostrich really eat anything? He wouldn't eat a bugle — or would he? George went a little closer to the cage — and before he knew it the ostrich had snatched the bugle and tried to swallow it. But a bugle is hard to swallow, even for an ostrich; it got stuck in his throat. Funny sounds came out of the bugle as the ostrich was struggling with it, all blue in the face.

George was frightened.

Fortunately the men had heard the noise. They came rushing to the cage and got the bugle out of the ostrich's throat just in time.

The director was very angry with George. "We cannot use little monkeys who don't do as they are told," he said. "Of course you cannot take part in the show now. We will have to send you home."

George had to sit on a bench all by himself and nobody even looked at him. He was terribly sorry for what he had done but now it was too late. He had spoiled everything.

Meanwhile the ostrich, always hungry, had got hold of a string dangling near his cage. This happened to be the string which held the door to the cage of the baby bear. As the ostrich nibbled at it the door opened — and the baby bear got out.

He ran away as fast as he could and made straight for a high tree near the camp.

Nobody had seen it but George — and George was not supposed to leave his bench.

But this was an emergency, so he jumped up, grabbed the bugle, and blew as loud as he could. Then he rushed to his bicycle.

The men had heard the alarm and thought at first that George had been naughty again.

But when they saw the empty cage and the ostrich nibbling at the string, they knew what had happened.

George raced toward the tree,
far ahead of the men.

By now the bear had climbed quite high — and this was dangerous because little bears can climb up a tree easily
but coming down
is much harder;

they may fall
and get hurt.

The men were worried.
They did not know how to get him down safely.
But George had his plan:

with the bag over his shoulder he went up the tree as fast as only a monkey can, and when he reached the baby bear

he put him
in his bag
and carefully
let him down
so that the men
could safely
catch him.

Everybody cheered when George had come down from the tree. “You are a brave little monkey,” said the director, “you saved the baby bear’s life. Now you’ll get your coat back and of course you may ride your bike and play the bugle in the show.”

Finally the show was on. The
and how surprised they were right in the middle of it!
and also the man

whole town had come to see it,
to discover George on his bike
The newsboy was there, too,
with the yellow hat who had been looking for George everywhere and was happy to have found him at last. The newsboy was glad to have his bag again, and the people from the other side of the street whose papers George had made into boats were not angry with him any more.

When the time had come for George to say goodbye, the director let him keep the coat and the cap and the bugle. And then George and his friend got into the car and went . . .

Good Night!

COLLECT ALL THE CLASSIC ADVENTURES

CURIOUS GEORGE® is a registered trademark, and the CURIOUS GEORGE logo is a trademark of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company.

Houghton Mifflin Harcourt
www.hmco.com
www.curiousgeorge.com

494371

$7.99 / Higher in Canada
ISBN 978-0-395-17444-9

